THE EFFECTS OF THE 1997-1998 EL NIÑO ON THE BIODIVERSITY OF THE TROPICAL FORESTS OF THE AMAZON BASIN

The 1997-1998 El Niño event had a significant impact on the biodiversity of the tropical forests of the Amazon basin. This study examines the effects of the event on the distribution and abundance of various species, including birds, mammals, and insects. The results show that the event led to a significant increase in the abundance of certain species, while others experienced a decline. The study also found that the event had a significant impact on the distribution of species, with many species moving to new areas in search of food and shelter.

The study was conducted in a large area of the Amazon basin, covering several countries. The researchers used a variety of methods to collect data, including field observations, trapping, and the use of remote sensing technology. The results of the study are presented in a series of tables and graphs, which show the changes in the abundance and distribution of various species over time.

The study has important implications for the conservation of the Amazon basin's biodiversity. It shows that the 1997-1998 El Niño event was a major disturbance to the ecosystem, and that the effects of the event were long-lasting. This information can be used to develop conservation strategies that take into account the effects of climate change on the Amazon basin's biodiversity.

The study also found that the 1997-1998 El Niño event had a significant impact on the distribution of species. Many species moved to new areas in search of food and shelter, which led to a significant increase in the abundance of certain species in those areas. The study was funded by the National Science Foundation and the Amazon Conservation Fund. The researchers would like to thank the many people who helped them with the study, including the local people and the staff of the research stations.
